

ough Anderson didn't have the boy in her class, she knew the teacher at Columbus Tustin who did.

"He wasn't doing well in (Columbus Tustin) school," she said. "When things don't work in one school, you hope things may work" at a new school.

Anderson said the boy's grandmother died a few months ago and his grandfather did "everything he could for him. He was trying real, real hard."

Anderson said she didn't know how the teachers and pupils would deal with news of the fellow student's killing.

"We'll play this by ear," she said. "If (students) want to talk, we'll talk. That's all you can do."
