MARS

After the engineers on the team determined which spots on Mars had smooth enough surfaces and winds for a rover landing, the scientists narrowed the choices.

"We then scrutinized those targets which had the greatest chance of having rocks or outcrops that were originally deposited in water," said Moore. What he is looking for is the Martian equivalent of limestone or sandstone.

The Mars explorer is currently roving around the Gusev Crater, a basin the size of the state of Connecticut, looking for evidence of water.

The main objective, said Moore, is to determine how water impacted the surface of Mars. If water existed on the red planet for an extended period of time, rather than just during flash floods, life is more likely to have formed. ■
