tract negotiation process.

A tentative agreement has reportedly been reached, and was presented to the city's SEIU members on Thursday after the Voice went to press. City officials and SEIU representative Richard Ames would not disclose details of the agreement before SEIU members had their vote.

When asked if the tentative agreement was progress, Ames said, "In my mind it is, after eight to nine months of negotiations." Ames is a building inspector for the city of Mountain View.

If ratified by the SEIU and approved by the council, the contract will also put into effect the council-approved contracts for the firefighters and the Eagles, both of which were set to expire heavily in coming years as more city employees retire.

In defense of the pension increases, city manager Kevin Duggan said there would be significant cost sharing for the pension increase, and that much of the funding will come from reserves earmarked for employee benefits. Finance director Bob Locke said the Eagles will pay $500,000 of the $4 million contract over the next four years. ■
