

... coordinator has assigned a moniker to every serial bank bandit in the seven-county area that encompasses metropolitan Los Angeles. There are 3,500 financial institutions in the region, the FBI said, and nearly two are robbed each business day.

The coordinator gets the report from every robbery, so it's easy for him to spot the connections between the heists and come up with the name.

Then, when a bank is robbed, authorities can ask the teller a series of questions to quickly identify the bandit. If that's not enough information, authorities can access security camera images within minutes to determine which bandit committed a robbery.

"Let's take the Big Belly Bandit," said Lt. Carlos Velez of the LAPD's Robbery-Homicide Division. "If we get hit on a Friday afternoon by an individual with a big belly, we're more apt to tie him into the series."

"The Big Belly Bandit — that had a nice ring to it."

The nicknames work because bank robberies are nearly always committed by serial bandits who don't like change. Once a robber is successful, he will nearly always rob again — and he'll use the same mode of operation and often wear the same clothing.

The Michael Jackson Bandit always wore a glove on just one hand. The Stereo Bandit always brought his car radio into the bank with him (just to make sure nobody stole it).

The Marx Brothers Bandits always wore fake bushy eyebrows and mustaches. The Buck Tooth Bandit always had a buck tooth.

"These are the most pragmatic people on Earth," Rehder said. "Once they find something that works, they stick with it. Rarely do they change."

"The only guy that really changed was Rodney Dangerfield."

Yes, Rodney changed his mode of operation. After being rejected at his first two attempted heists, he brought a gun to No. 3. This time, he got respect. And money.

Authorities also use the nicknames to generate publicity for a case. Newspaper editors and television producers like funny names, and one of the best ways the former Yankees Bandit. in Washington on Friday, the dent.
